Choosing Legal Representation for Your Family Law Matter

Statistics provided by the Colorado Bar Association indicate that the number of individuals handling Colorado family law matters without the benefit of an attorney is now as high as 70%. While this trend has led to a generalized demystification of the family law court, many of those individuals with complex cases who have attempted to navigate the labyrinth of our legal system without legal representation have suffered the consequences of their inexperience and limited understanding of our state's legal system.

Retaining the services of a family law attorney has significant advantages. A lawyer will be familiar with the state's recent changes in family law, and they will understand the current version of the Rules of Civil Procedure. They know how and when to file petitions and motions with the court and have experience with property division, maintenance, and the allocation of parental rights. Additionally they are aware of the rules that must be followed in the county that maintains jurisdiction over the case, and they will seek to ensure that their clients have full knowledge and understanding of the contents of the binding final agreement.
